As you know, [REDACTED] is going to start college soon. My goal is to have her, financial obligations free and therefore stress free while attending school. That way, her main focus will be school which will hopefully translate into high academic performance and therefore good grades, a leading component to secure a high paying job. I will assume her academic financial needs and part of her personal needs while she attends her first 4 years of college. As for her monthly personal needs while in school, this is what she came up with:

MONTHLY EXPENSES

Insurance $200
Nails $75
Gas $60
Misc. $100

That is a total of $435, which I suggest rounding up to $600 a month because of unplanned circumstances. And here is what I suggested to her:

Her child support will end on June 28, 2019. Instead of spending money going to court to adjust the amount, I suggested that I will let her portion of the support money continue to come to you and I understand it will not be halved because [REDACTED] is being dropped. My best guess is, it will be around $400. You receive $1,100+ on a monthly basis.

You could add the $200 to [REDACTED] portion to make it $600 and pass that on to her. $300 every 2 weeks will be the best way of doing it, so she does not wait 30 days to have cash.

Let me know in the next couple of days, since school starts soon on June 24.
